

"Mercury must be retrograde or something," you think to your self as you log into your cloud storage account. Thankfully, your files are sitting on a server farm somewhere.

~~All of a sudden, as your cloud-based~~

As you are downloading the files you need to work on, another terrible bolt of lightning strikes, causing your apartment's lights to flicker. Your download resumes, except now you are noticing little error messages popping up. "Rejected by server," the little pop-up dialogue claims. You check your phone for the advice on the error, and come across a recent news article, with the byline:

Cloud server farm struck by lightning! Mass data casualties expected!"
